LAW NOTES
Support:College Expenses

Is a divorced parent under a duty to contribute to an adult child's education? A support order may be entered against a parent for a child's college education even in the absence of an agreement to support the child past the age of eighteen. This responsibility is shared by both parents! However: college support for an adult child may not be ordered where such an order would impose an undue hardship upon the parent. The child in question must also possess the aptitude and the desire to successfully complete the course of studies chosen

This duty of support is grounded in a recognition of the modern day importance of a college degree. It insures that children from broken homes are not denied an opportunity for such a degree because of the problems of their parents. Except in unusual cases, a parent's obligation to pay his child's college expenses may not be extended past the child's 23rd birthday

LAW NOTES are designed to provide general information concerning topics of interest to the community at large. You should check with a lawyer before acting on any information contained in LAW NOTES because the facts and circumstances surrounding any individual situations may vary
